The book finds that the framing of immigrants in news media has become increasingly negative in recent years. Immigrants are often portrayed as criminals, job-stealers, and a threat to American values. This negative framing has contributed to a decline in public support for immigration.

The Impact of News Coverage on Public Opinion

The media's framing of immigrants has a significant impact on public opinion. The book finds that people who are exposed to negative news coverage about immigrants are more likely to have negative attitudes towards immigrants. This negative coverage can also lead to increased support for anti-immigrant policies.

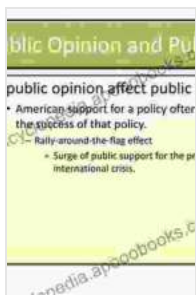

The Impact of News Coverage on Policy

The media's framing of immigrants also has an impact on policy decisions. The book finds that policymakers are more likely to support anti-immigrant policies when the media is framing immigrants in a negative light. This negative framing can make it more difficult for policymakers to support pro-immigrant policies.
