Description

This book examines the role of intraparty politics in shaping the representation of Republican women in Congress. It argues that intraparty competition and the need for party unity have led to the underrepresentation of Republican women in Congress.

The book begins by providing an overview of the history of women in Congress and the Republican Party. It then examines the role of intraparty politics in shaping the recruitment, nomination, and election of Republican women. The book finds that intraparty competition and the need for party unity have made it difficult for Republican women to win elections.

The book concludes by arguing that the underrepresentation of Republican women in Congress is a problem for both the Republican Party and the United States as a whole. It calls for changes to intraparty politics and electoral rules to make it easier for Republican women to win elections.
