The political self is the part of us that is concerned with power and influence. It is the part of us that wants to be in control and to make things happen. The political self is not inherently good or evil, but it can be used for either good or evil purposes.

The development of the political self begins in childhood. As we learn to interact with others, we begin to understand the importance of power and influence. We learn that we can get what we want by using our power to control others. We also learn that we can be controlled by others if they have more power than us.

The political self continues to develop throughout adolescence and adulthood. As we go through different experiences, we learn more about how power works and how to use it to our advantage. We also learn more about our own values and beliefs, and how these values and beliefs affect our political behavior.

The political self is a complex and multifaceted phenomenon. It is shaped by a variety of factors, including our genes, our environment, and our experiences. The political self is also constantly evolving, as we learn new things and as our values and beliefs change.

The birth of the political self is a major turning point in human history. It is the point at which we become aware of our own power and influence, and of our ability to use this power to shape the world around us. The political self is a powerful force for good, but it can also be a force for evil. It is up to us to use our political power wisely, to create a more just and equitable world.
