The Bread Subsidy Program: A Political Lifeline

Recognizing the importance of bread to its citizens, the Jordanian government has long implemented a bread subsidy program. This program, which subsidizes the price of flour used in bread production, has been a critical safety net for the country's poor and middle class. By keeping bread affordable, the government has helped to ensure food security and maintain social stability.

Bread and Political Unrest

However, the bread subsidy program has also been a source of political tension. When the government has attempted to reduce or eliminate subsidies, it has often met with widespread protests and even riots. In 1996, for example, a sharp increase in bread prices sparked widespread demonstrations across the country, leading to the resignation of the prime minister.

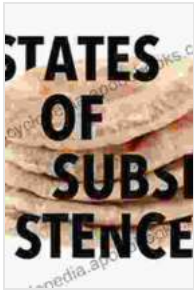

The Political Economy of Food

The case of bread in Jordan highlights the complex interplay between food and politics. Bread is not merely a commodity; it is a political tool that can be used to gain support or quell dissent. The government's bread subsidy program is a form of social welfare that has helped to maintain political stability, but it has also created a dependency on government handouts.

In "The Politics of Bread in Contemporary Jordan," XXX presents a multi-faceted analysis of the relationship between bread and society in Jordan. Through a detailed examination of the bread subsidy program, the author sheds light on the political economy of food and the ways in which this basic foodstuff has shaped the political landscape of the country.
