This book examines the significance of Paul Virilio's thought for the development of New Security Studies, offering a radical reframing of the field.

Paul Virilio (1932-2018) was a French philosopher, urbanist, and film theorist who developed a distinctive approach to understanding the relationship between technology, speed, and power. His work has been influential in a wide range of disciplines, including international relations, security studies, and cultural studies.

In this book, a team of international scholars explores the implications of Virilio's thought for the study of security. They argue that Virilio's concepts of dromology (the study of speed and movement) and the "logistics of perception" offer new ways of understanding how technologies of war and surveillance shape our experiences of risk and insecurity.

The book is divided into three parts. The first part examines Virilio's concept of dromology and its implications for our understanding of conflict and security. The second part explores Virilio's work on the "logistics of perception" and its relevance for the study of surveillance and risk. The third part brings together a range of case studies that demonstrate the value of Virilio's thought for understanding contemporary security challenges.

This book is essential reading for scholars and students interested in New Security Studies, critical security studies, and the work of Paul Virilio.
